SAWNEY BEANE
ca. 1390—1437

At twenty, Sawney Beane could no longer bear the simple constraints of civil Scotch society and fled Edinburgh in the company of a churlish woman to the desolate coast of Galloway. There they remained for twenty-five years, apart from the company and knowledge of their fellow man. Over the years, their carnal grunts spewed forth a brutish band of whelps whose incestuous ranks quickly reached clanish proportions. The barbarous crew supported themselves by preying on travelers of the coastal roads near their abode. All who passed were murdered, slaughtered, and eaten. Fate finally provided a survivor whose grisly tale caused the outraged King of Scotland to lead on immediate search of the caverns dotting the coast of Galloway. The entire Beane clan was taken by surprise in a foetid cave hung with the salted torsos and limbs of recent victims. Taken to Edinburgh and there condemned for the murder of over a thousand, the clansmen suffered slow dismemberment by blunt saws while the women and children were put to the torch. All died unrepentant, shouting obscene curses at the gathered throng.
