

trillions of zooplankton migrate every night from the ocean's depths up to the surface and back. It is important to the functioning of deep-sea food webs and the biologically driven sequestration of carbon. Also, being somewhere where there's more light make you easier for a predator to spot. Therefore zooplankton are thought to feed at the surface when darkness falls and move to deeper, darker water during the day to avoid predators.

